The Queen's Counsel of the time were in want of a professional costume, which would enable them to rival the bravery of the serjeant-at-law; and they decided with one vote that the Court dress and silk gown, which made up the mourning of the time, were highly suitable for the purpose, and therefore adopted them, together with the full-bottomed wig, then usually worn by all persons of position.

THE DISUSE OF WIGS.

Wigs, as every body knows, survived down to the accession of George III., when they went out of general use, and gradually came to be retained only by attorneys, counsel, and gentlemen.
